ner. Or the signal may mean that the runner is to try to get through between Yale's center and one of her guards. The Princeton center and guard will direct their efforts accordingly. As the ball is put in play they will try to push the Yale men out of the way, while the other half back and Capt. King, running behind the half back who has the ball, will add their strength to his in pushing him through the Yale rushers toward Yale's goal.

Of course, the knowledge that one team has of exactly what is to come next gives a great advantage over the opposing eleven, which has to keep its attention divided and prepared for attacks at a dozen different points. In the big game at Springfield Yale beat Harvard by making the latter believe that the runner was going to force his way through Harvard's center. Having concentrated Harvard's attention at that point it was easy to send C. D. Bliss around the end for a touch down.

There is no doubt that the men would have had an encounter before had they not been kept apart by B. F. Ely, who is James S. Ely's brother and Mosely's business partner. The relations between the men have long been strained, but there were never any open hostilities until the affair of the letter came up.

Alto V. Lee, who was a candidate for Congress from the third district, wrote a letter to Mosely asking him to use his influence toward his nomination. Lee said that he wanted a strong Bullock county delegation: he would prefer the regular democratic nomination, but he wanted a delegation anyway.

The Ely side of the story is that Mosely left the letter in a store, and thus it fell into the hands of Ely, who sent it to Cates, the other candidate. Cates used this letter, and Lee claimed that it was one of the causes of his defeat. Mosely claims that he never received the letter and that Ely secured it unfairly. This charge in itself was looked upon as being a cause for an affray.

the approaching comet and have the tail play a limited engagement down some of our streets.—
Indianapolis News.

That comet may have designs on the earth, and it may not, but if it comes too close to Jackson Fark it will be gathered in and exhibited in one corner of the big building next year without extra charge. Trusty men are on the lookout for it.—Chicago Tribune.

No two of the astronomical doctors can agree about the comet. The less they know the more they talk.—New York Recorder.

The influence of comets is always seen in the reduction of a certain degree of intelligence to a state of coma. So far as known, the only influence of these erratic celestial tramps upon things earthly is to fill the minds of the simple with foreboding and to inspire the mischievous with solemn chaff.—Philadelphia North Ameri-
